

Tam O the Scoots

Lieutenant Bridgeman went out over the German line and strafed a depot. He stayed a while to locate a new gun position and was caught between three strong batteries of Archies. Reports? said the wing commander. Well, Bridgeman isn't back and Tam said he saw him nose-dive behind the German trenches. So the report was made to Headquarters and Headquarters sent forward a long account of air flights for publication in the days communique, adding, One of our machines did not return. But, A doot if hes killit, said Tam; he flattened oot before he reached airth an flew aroond a bit. Wi ye no ask Mr. Lasky, sir-r, hes just in? Mr. Lasky was a bright-faced lad who, in ordinary circumstances, might have been looking forward to his leaving-book from Eton, but now had to his credit divers bombed dumps and three enemy airmen. He met the brown-faced, red-haired, awkwardly built youth whom all the Flying Corps called Tam. Ah, Tam, said Lasky reproachfully, I was looking for youI wanted you badly. Tam chuckled. A thocht so, he said, but A wis not so far frae the aerodrome when yon feller chased you I was chasing him! said the indignant Lasky. Oh, ay? replied the other skeptically. An was ye wantin the Scoot to help ye chase ain puir wee Hoon? Sir-r, A think shame on ye for misusin the puir laddie. There were four, protested Lasky. And yeer gun jammed, Am thinkin, so wi rair presence o mind, ye stood oop in the fuselage an hit the nairest representative of the Imperial Gairman Air Sairvice a crack over the heid wi a spanner. A little group began to form at the door of the mess-room, for the news that Tam the Scoot was up was always sufficient to attract an audience. As for the victim of Tams irony, his eyes were dancing with glee.
