Excerpt from Essays on Archaeological Subjects, Vol. 2 of 2: And on Various Questions Connected With the History of Art, Science, and Literature in the Middle Ages
In the final breaking up of the Roman Empire, polite literature suffered much more than science. While there were few, if any, of the barbarians who established themselves in the Imperial provinces, capable of appreciating the pure models of composition bequeathed to them by the classic writers, many, existed by the novelties offered to their view on every side, were seized with an ardent thirst after knowledge. We know with what avidity the sciences of the Greeks and the Romans were taken up by the Arabian conquerors, who subsequently gave to them an extraordinary development.
