

Harvest: A Melange Relating to Brooklyn City in Particular and to the World Generally (Classic Reprint)

Some time in the fall of 1862, the author of the following pages, from being an occasional, became a constant contributor to the Press, between intervals of study in preparing himself for the legal profession. His offerings, mostly of a light and unsentimental nature, were well received, and subsequently, (March, 1864), on being solicited, he connected himself with one of the daily papers, and gave to it exclusively eight of the best years of his life. They were not wasted years ;for with the consciousness of having, to the best of his ability ,without fear or favor, done what he conceived, and still conceives, to be a journalists duty, he retains many pleasant assurances and mementoes of honorable approval, together with the friendship of many noble-minded men, with whom he was first brought into contact by the accidents and events which it was his business to chronicle. During this period of journalistic experience, terminated by his resignation, in order to engage in the practice of the law, there appeared from his pen, under many noms de plume, a number of Comic Ballads, Epigrams, c., a very inconsiderable portion of which the following pages comprise. The incidents on which they are founded will, he doubts not, be pleasantly recalled by their perusal to the minds of at least a large number of friends and acquaintances ;and in this pleasing expectation, rather than in the delusive belief that their possible merits will make them more extensively known, they are here unambitiously submitted by Thk A c Toa.
