

Boat Sailors: Vietnam War action by fleet submarines

In the mid-nineteen-sixties some conventional fleet submarines were refitted to carry small teams of combat swimmers (Underwater Demolition Teams [UDT] and Sea, Land and Air teams [SEALs]) for a variety of combat operations. Their primary mission was beach reconnaissance. Subic Bay provided the main base for operations and was known as Detachment Alpha (Det Alpha). Det Bravo was deployed on an APD, a high-speed transport ship. Det Charlie operated from the USS Perch APSS 313, and later the USS Grayback LPSS 574, and USS Tunny LPSS 282. All three of these submarines were left over from World War II, but all were still plenty spirited.

A Synopsis: Brice Moser needed to get away from the farm for awhile, so he sowed some wild oats as his dad and uncles called it. So he joined the navy. Just a few days from saying I do he was on his way to San Diego, California, boot camp, then weapons school, then shore duty. Well, shore duty wasn't a lot more exciting than throwing bales and milking cows back in Iowa, so he volunteered for submarines. With the Vietnam War heating up, things would soon get a bit more interesting.

This absolute neophyte to the ways of the navy and especially to the ways of the submarine navy would need a mentor: Second Class Electronics Technician Richards, hailing from Texas, had already been in the navy for five years, and his boat, as boat swabbies fondly referred to their home submarines, had just gotten orders to steam from Pearl Harbor, into the western Pacific and their new home port of Subic Bay, the Philippine Islands. There they would take on Underwater Demolition Teams (UDT) and Sea, Land and Air teams (SEALs) for beach reconnaissance and other special operations.

An Excerpt: So a fresh sailor from Iowa and barely out of bootcamp was handed a gun and told to stand topside watch, and really wasn't sure what he should do about the approaching men carrying flaming torches. Before arrival to wherever they were the crew had been told they might experience protests at this port. But they didnt say what kind of protests, and whether they might be dangerous or not. Even Moser had heard that announcement. And these guys looked like they were planning to definitely protest something. His right hand reached for the pistol, then just rested on the holster. Other pistols, with cylinders, he had fired. A semiautomatic was different, but it felt good under his hand and at least was there, available. He probably could figure out how to fire it if he needed to. His other hand flicked the switch for the intercom to below decks. He leaned over, grabbed another shallow breath and could barely believe what he was about to say, then spoke, Repel boarders, port side! His voice cracked; he cleared his throat, then repeated, Repel boarders, port side! A few seconds passed. Nobody answered. Goddamn it, theres men up here with torches coming through the alley! Repel boarders! Repel boarders! For all Moser knew the Japanese men were coming just to talk, or maybe just to yell at him, yell at an American sailor and an American submarine. After all, in 1965 Japan, World War II probably wasnt that ancient a history. He reached again for the intercom button Hold it, Moser. An officera lieutenant Moser knew from the two gold bars on the mans shirt collar, and gold dolphinsappearedfrom limbo as far as Moser was concerned. The officer approached the topside intercom box, leaned into it, Repel boarders, port side! Not a drill! Repel boarders, port side! Not a drill! Moser, check your weapon! Moser did just that. He unsnapped the holster, pulled the pistol out, and dropped it. It hit the wooden deck, clunked like it weighed a ton, then lay still. Moser, goddamn it, check your weapon!(Sorry, out of room.)
