

New Fields for the Writer (Classic Reprint)

New Fields for the Writer is no opportunistic phrase coined by an ambitious publisher and an alert editor. The phrase is indicative of new avenues of opportunity which are available to young assiduous writers. Those men and women who are vitally interested in making of writing their career must first be willing to learn the necessary technique of each medium: television, radio, film, drama. It is not until he or she has mastered the technical details of each craft that he can begin to reap whatever profits result from his ability or perseverance. Each of these media has its own specialized problems. To approach these the writer cannot come with an arbitrary or I 11-take-a-chance attitude. He must, in order to attain success, be willing to learn all the rudiments technical and theoretical; be willing and even anxious to study and expand his own knowledge. Then, after having learned the elementary details, he may try to infuse original ideas into his own work. Let us take a theoretical example. What may, for instance, be suitable to the needs of the theatre as a script may not be adaptable to the movies. Hence, it is imperative that the writer first learn what are the technical and mechanical demands that distinguish filmscenarios from drama-scripts. An important rule to remember is: it is only when the writer is fully familiar with all the regulations that he can then afford to experiment.
