

Old rose and silver

Excerpt: ...surrounded by fog. It had drifted far out of its course, and collided with a derelict. The captain ordered the band to play, the officers put on their dress uniforms and their white gloves. Another ship, that was drifting, too, signalled in answer to the music, and all were saved. That was possible-but there can be no signal for me. Perhaps not, but lets put on our white gloves and order out the band. The unconscious plural struck Rose with deep significance. Did you- know, Aunt Francesca? Yes, dear. For how long? Always, I think. Did it seem-absurd, in any way? Not at all. I was hoping for it, until the wind changed. And, she added, with her face turned away, Colonel Kent was, too. Some of the colour ebbed slowly back into the white, stricken face. That makes me feel, Rose breathed, as if I hadnt been quite so foolish as Ive been thinking I was. Then keep the high heart, dear, for they mustnt suspect. No, cried Rose sharply, oh, no! Anything but that! Its hard to wear gloves when you dont want to, replied Madame, with seeming irrelevance, but its easier when there are others. The Colonel will need them, too-this is going to be hard on him. Does-he-know? whispered Rose, fearfully. No, answered Madame, laughing outright, indeed he doesnt. Did you ever know of a man discovering anything that wasnt right under his nose? And I am safe with-with- With everybody but Isabel. She may be foolish, but shes a woman, and even a woman can see around a corner. Thank you for telling me, said Rose, after a little; for giving me time. It was like you. Im glad I could, but remember, I havent told you, officially. Let her tell you herself. Rose nodded. Then Ill come down just as soon as I can. With white gloves on, dear, and flags flying. Make your old aunt proud of you now, wont you? Ill try, she answered, humbly, then quickly closed the door. Meanwhile Colonel Kent, most correctly...
