

Pale Fire: A Poem in Four Cantos by John Shade

Many think Pale Fire Vladimir Nabokovs greatest novel. At its heart beats the 999-line poem, Pale Fire, penned by the distinguished American poet John Shade. This first-ever facsimile edition of the poem shows it to be not just a fictional device but a masterpiece of American poetry, albeit by an invented persona -- the greatest of invented poets, according to Nabokovs own accurate evaluation. In the novel Shades mad neighbor, Charles Kinbote, absconds with the index-card manuscript of the poem, compiling an ostensible line-by-line commentary that largely ignores Shades text and heeds only his own egotism. Kinbotes commentary, the bulk of the novel, is an insane comic triumph of would-be romantic self-celebration that cannot quite mute its undertones of desperation. But here we rescue Pale Fire from the madmans hand to show the magicians sleight of hand, and the enchantment, in Nabokovs most ambitious poem. Renowned Nabokov authority Brian Boyd brilliantly explains Pale Fire on its and Shades own terms, showing how its texture compares with Shakespeares sonnets at their best. Poet R.S. Gwynn sets it in the context of American poetry of its time. Artist Jean Holabird, who conceived the project, illustrates key details of the poems pattern and pathos. Now readers can see the text for themselves, fresh from Shades hands, before Kinbote commandeered it so shamelessly. This attractive box contains two booklets the poem Pale Fire in a handsome pocket edition and the book of essays by Boyd and Gwynn as well as facsimiles of the index cards that John Shade (like his maker, Nabokov) used for composing his poem, printed exactly as Vladimir Nabokov described them.
