

The Life of John James Audubon: The Naturalist (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Life of John James Audubon: The Naturalist

The winters frosts had set in. Audubon was following some grouse down the creek, when suddenly he came upon Mr. Bakewell, who at once dissipated the Frenchman's prejudices by the discovery of kindred tastes. Audubon writes I was struck with the kind politeness of his manners, and found him a most expert marksman, and entered into conversation. I admired the beauty of his well-trained dogs, and finally promised to call upon him and his family. Well do I recollect the morning, and may it please God may I never forget it, when, for the first time I entered the Bakewell household. It happened that Mr. Bakewell was from home. I was shown into a parlour, where only one young lady was snugly seated at work, with her back turned towards the fire. She rose on my entrance, offered me a seat, and assured me of the gratification her father would feel on his return, which, she added with a smile, would be in a few minutes, as she would send a servant after him. Other ruddy cheeks made their appearance, but like spirits gay, vanished from my sight. Talking and working, the young lady who remained made the time pass pleasantly enough, and to me especially so. It was she, my dear Lucy Bakewell.
