

The Pragmatist

Henry Clutter has been protecting his wife for years, a sentinel against her power as a werewolf. Their love has flickered and died over time-- she ate his foot a few years back-- but keeping each and every person safe from the Wolf has become Henry's focused purpose for living. But when the local Satan worshippers, who call themselves a Chola, find out that there is an actual werewolf, a bridge to magic, they kidnap her and use her as a gateway to making a deal with devil himself, Scratch. The rules of the deal are simple, to get a gift from Scratch, you have to kill everyone that you love. And instead of choosing your gift, you get whatever your heart truly desires. Scratch points out to everyone that most people screwed up enough to kill their families actually desire death. But no one from the Chola believes him, focused as they are on the shallow gifts of youth, popularity, and beauty. As Henry closes in and realizes the awful use of his wife by the Chola, he finds a terrible sense of purpose, vowing to stop the Chola by torture, knife play, or whatever it takes to at best rescue, but barring that, avenge his wife and make sure that no one in the Chola is ever young, popular, or beautiful again.
