

The Romance of Arthur

The Arthurian stories bring love (and women) into heroic narrative in a big way.

In classical epic, women are not absent (marital love is particularly important in the Odyssey, as well as in the Iliad in the relationship between Hector and Andromache, and the Dido episode is of course crucial to the Aeneid), but love between men and women is not a central source of positive value in anything like the way it is in the Arthurian tradition. In the world of Arthur, a knight is not truly complete unless he combines martial prowess with a commitment to a transcendent emotional engagement with one person, his lady. The rise of courtly love in the twelfth century has been called by C.S. Lewis one of the few real changes in human sentiment on record (The Allegory of Love, and that change profoundly colors the world of Arthurian romance in all sorts of ways.
