

The Spirit of the Time (Classic Reprint)

Derrick Merton, although he prided himself on being a man of will and possessing a sense of humour, felt that he really couldn't stand things much longer. Like thousands of other people he was suffering from reaction after the long nightmare of war. Although he had been too old alas, he was over fifty for active service he had spent a great part of the last five years in doing things which were hardly in his line, because he had considered it his duty to do them.
